

The One to Call When Disaster Strikes

The ever-changing situation with coronavirus (COVID-19) makes for a lot of fear and uncertainty, especially since most people have never had to deal with a pandemic before.

As a disaster restoration company, Burggraf has spent more than thirty years cleaning up after things go wrong. We've learned that the most important thing to do is to be proactive about developing a plan. You hope you never have to use it, but if you do, it makes everything much easier.

By consulting with a restoration company to develop a standard operating procedure, you'll be better able to manage the risk of this coronavirus.

Here's how we can help:

- Safe, effective cleaning products - We use all-natural, EPA-approved green products that have proven to be effective against enveloped viruses and leave no harmful residue. We also have cleaning equipment, such as hydroxyl units to sterilize the air, which has proven effective against other enveloped viruses.

- Infectious disease protocols - Our goal is to ensure the area is properly sanitized and safe for everybody. Industrial hygienists and indoor air quality specialists are available to test quality and develop protocols.
- Years of experience - In addition to our experience with schools, Burggraf Disaster Restoration has worked with numerous hospitals and nursing homes to clean up after disasters. We have experience in avoiding cross-contamination in environments where it's most important.
- Training for you and your staff - We'll help you develop a plan for your facilities and standard operating procedure for your staff to prevent spread of infectious disease.

With this being an evolving situation, we will update our protocols as needed. As things change, so will our cleaning methods. We are working closely with expert chemical engineers and using the latest protocols and procedures to help keep our community safe.

"A fire in our gym threatened to cancel our home basketball season. Within an hour, Burggraf called. Within a day, they were cleaning and restoring the facility. Without a doubt, I would definitely call Burggraf Restoration. Great people - great company."
